Subsidizing unholy matrimony

The University of Colorado in Boulder is going to join the club of campuses extending so-called domestic-partner benefits to unmarried couples, including homosexuals, among students. The state-funded university's health service will begin offering health insurance coverage to unmarried partners among the student body starting in the fall.

This follows an announcement recently by the faculty of Colorado State University in Fort Collins that they are considering offering such benefits to unmarried partners of faculty and staff at that school.

Thanks, guys, for another blow to the traditional family. At a time when assorted social maladies increasingly are being traced to the devaluation of marriage, CU has decided to abandon marriage altogether.

That in itself is a sad development; it's downright insulting that it'll be on the taxpayers' tab.
